Judge mulls gov't request to keep John Bell in prison

By Nick Delgado

nick@postguam.com

One of the alleged victim's who accused attorney John Bell of attacking and holding her hostage at his law office in Tamuning testified in court that the defendant harassed them on social media.

The local attorney appeared before Superior Court of Guam Maria Cenzone on Facebook and mentioned only the work titles of the alleged victims.

"I saw that he was talking about our law firm, about the mafia and had a theory that we were trying to take down the law firm," the victim said.

It was said in court that the post was

work titles of the alleged victims.

Bell, who has been held in the Department of Corrections since he was caught repeatedly violating his house arrest conditions, has denied the allegations that he harassed the victims on social media.

The prosecution requested that the court revoke Bell's pretrial release.

Judge Cenzone took the matter under advisement and is expected to issue a decision shortly.

Bell has admitted that he used methamphetamine while on pretrial release.

He stands accused of holding his staff hostage and assaulting them back in July.

Bell pleaded not guilty to three counts of terrorizing and three counts of felonious restraint as third-degree felonies; and three counts of assault as misdemeanors.

Complaint: Man chokes woman after she finds photos of meth on his phone

By Nick Delgado

nick@postguam.com

A man who was released from prison after being accused of strangling a woman known to him is back in custody after an alleged incident involving the same person.

Jaevin John Hobson Quidachay

Jaevin John Hobson Quidachay, 28, was charged with strangulation, family violence, and interfering with the reporting of family violence, each as third-degree felonies and including a notice of commission of felony while on felony release. He was also charged with family violence and violation of a court order, both as misdemeanors.

According to court documents, the pair started to argue after the victim saw photos of what appeared to be methamphetamine on his phone.

Quidachay allegedly punched the refrigerator before he got on top of the victim and started to choke her. The woman escaped briefly before he pushed her to the bed, head butted, and strangled her, documents state.

Quidachay stopped the victim from calling police before he threatened to cut himself with a knife and blame the victim, documents state.

When talking to police, he allegedly said they argued but denied attacking her stating that he only hugged and kissed her during the argument.

He also told officers that he "wouldn't touch any woman," documents state.

The suspect was on pretrial release for a separate family violence and strangulation case involving the same victim, documents state.

Japanese youth activists trying to KNOCK DOWN BARRIERS

TOKYO - They flooded Instagram and Twitter with voting information. They designed stunning posters, launched hashtag campaigns, filmed celebrity videos. They even offered discounts at trendy shops.

But in a country with a stubbornly low turnout rate among younger voters, political activists in Japan face unique hurdles. Simply talking about politics and voting defies cultural norms for young Japanese.

The reasons are varied. Some cited an age gap with Japan's overwhelmingly older political leadership. Others cite laws that have banned student-led political organizing. The end result, analysts say, is an atmosphere where young people often feel as if they don't have a say in the country's future.

"In Japan, at its core, the problem is the real lack of diversity in the political world," said Momoko Nojo, 23, a graduate school student who leads the activist group No Youth No Japan. "There are very few young politicians out there, so it doesn't really seem like they are thinking about young people."

The relative silence around elections and voting among Japan's youth stands in vivid contrast to the increasingly divisive and hyperpolarized atmosphere in its allied countries, including the United States and parts of Europe.

Ahead of the Oct. 31 general election, activists held a flurry of voter-mobilization efforts around Tokyo and online. The hope was that the coronavirus pandemic had boosted civic awareness and social media engagement among voters in their 20s.

Such campaigns aimed at younger people are a relatively new trend, and these activists are trying to normalize voting - or even just having open discussions about voting.

But they face an uphill battle. Japan's voter turnout has persistently remained at the lower end among developed countries.

Just over half of eligible voters cast ballots in this year's general election, the third-lowest in Japan's postwar history. The United States, which also trails many developed countries in voter turnout, has seen an uptick in recent elections. In 2020, two-thirds of eligible voters cast a ballot. The 2018 midterms drew the highest midterm turnout since 1914.

Youth-voter turnout in Japan has remained low, with about one-third of eligible voters in their 20s participating in the 2017 general election. The United States has seen the opposite trend, with voters under 30 breaking turnout records in 2018 and 2020.

Motivating younger and first-time voters to cast their ballot is difficult in any country, but activists say it is uniquely hard in Japan.

Among the 465 politicians elected to the House of Representatives last month, the average age was 55.5. Just under 10% of elected leaders in the lower chamber were women.

Online campaigning and digital outreach are relatively new in Japan - unlike in the United States and many other countries, where hyperpartisan online campaigning has become a fixture of political life. However, this has also opened the door to disinformation and conspiracy theories.

No Youth No Japan, which launched in 2019, is made up of members in their teens and 20s. It operates mainly on social media, answering younger voters' questions about the election and educating nearly 100,000 followers about the parties, their stances and how to vote. The group saw greater interest on its social media platforms in this year's elections, Nojo said.

"COVID played a big role in showing us how much politics were interconnected to our daily lives, so definitely more people became engaged," she said.

A coalition of social activists came together for the first time during this year's general election campaign to submit a questionnaire addressing 19 social issues, asking the parties about issues such as climate change and the pandemic response. The activists in the group met on Twitter, and they decided there would be strength in numbers.

"We all felt ignored and forgotten on various issues," said Ayaka Machida, 26, a graduate student and an organizer with Minna no Mirai 2021, or 67 Questions for our Future.

As a teen, Machida advocated for lowering the voting age to 18 from 20, a 2016 change designed to encourage youth civic engagement. Now, she is a gender rights activist.

"I hoped that young people were actually seen by the government, so that they will actually speak to them and create policies thinking about them," she said.

In Japan, asking people about their politics is still considered a social faux pas. Such sentiments have carried
